Trade Conditionality

Michael P. Malloy “Human Rights and Unintended Consequences: Empirical Analysis of International Economic Sanctions in Contemporary Practice”, Boston University International Law Journal, v. 31 (2011) p. 75

Abstract:

The author empirically analyzes the use of sanctions in response to humanitarian crises in four countries: Zimbabwe (then Southern Rhodesia), Belarus, Myanmar, and South Africa. The author finds that whether the sanctions are unilateral or multilateral has little effect on the design or the effectiveness of the sanctions. The author notes that it is difficult to measure the long-term effectiveness of sanctions because nations under sanctions gradually adapt to economic constraints, or develop alternative methods of capitalization. However, the author finds that the biggest predictor of whether the sanctions will be effective in the short term is the purpose of the sanction. Sanctions imposed because of national security concerns tend to be immediately effective, whereas sanctions imposed to remedy human rights abuses, such as child labor or trafficking, are less effective. This is likely because labor and human rights practices are ingrained in economic and political systems, and, in the case of labor abuses, are often perpetrated by non-governmental actors.

Country-Specific Case Study: Ghana

Dzodzi Tsikata “Toward a Decent Work Regime for Informal Employment in Ghana: Some Preliminary Considerations”, Comparative Labor Law and Policy Journal, v. 32 (Winter, 2011) p. 311

Abstract:

The author outlines the labor regime in Ghana, focusing on the informal labor markets where the majority of Ghanaian laborers work. Neoliberal policies, such as the Draft National Employment Policy, the Labour Act, and the Social Security Act, protect entrepreneurship at the expense of workers by making labor crimes difficult to prosecute and limiting the ability of unions to organize. Though the Social Security Act allows informal workers to voluntarily contribute to the scheme so that they may later receive payments, the wage of Ghanans in informal work arrangements is so low that the program is seldom utilized. The author describes in detail the informal labor markets that exist in the fishing, mining, and domestic service industries, and argues that Ghanaian policy makers must break from their neoliberal approach and legitimize such work by broadening the legal definition of employment and enforcing a universal minimum wage.

Corporate Codes of Conduct

Li-Wen Lin “Legal Transplants through Private Contracting: Codes of Vendor Conduct in Global Supply Chains as an Example”, American Journal of Comparative Law, v. 57 (Summer, 2009) p. 711

Abstract:

The author argues that codes of vendor conduct in international supply chains function as legal transplants. Legal transplants occur when laws, rules, or legal structures are transplanted from one country to another. The author identifies two ways in which transplantation occurs: through 'hard' approaches such as the rules that the European Union and World Trade Organization impose upon their members, and through 'soft' approaches such as model codes of conduct. In the globalized economy, non-state actors can also transplant laws. The author argues that vendor codes of conduct, which large corporations such as Gap and Wal-Mart use to determine supplier eligibility, are examples of transplanted laws. These transplanted quasi-legal regulations are especially effective in countries where legal systems are weak and the sanction of losing business is a greater threat than sanctions imposed by law. The author argues that codes of vendor conduct often set the template for labor laws in developing nations, and thus should be strengthened to address the labor issues in such countries.
